

Part Two

The Reds are putting themselves and others at risk for foodborne illness. Picking while ill, bringing pets into the fields, and eating or drinking in the fields could all cause cross contamination in the fields and potentially pass harmful bacteria and viruses to others.

The Reds should not have brought any food or drinks into the field, but instead finished them before entering, thrown them away, or left them in the car. They should not eat the berries while picking but wait until they are out of the fields and have washed them before enjoying them.
